Postgraduate Program in Psychotherapy Supervision

The DSAP Certificate and Diploma in Supervision

Friday November 25 - Sunday November 27, 2016

The C.G. Jung Institute in Copenhagen and the Danish Society for Analytical Psychology (DSAP) invite to an

Introduction to the psychology of supervision; a psychodynamic approach informed by Jungian theory and practice

This 2 1/2 days course from Friday, Nov. 25 at 10:00 am to Sunday, Nov. 27 at 14:00 pm will combine the theory and practice of clinical supervision. The introductory course will be informed by a psychodynamic approach including theoretical and clinical aspects of analytical psychology. The clinical component of the course will be organized around small groups with supervision of psychotherapy supervision cases. Participants are encouraged to bring examples of their own supervisory cases to the course. Each group will be led by one of the lecturers/organizers.

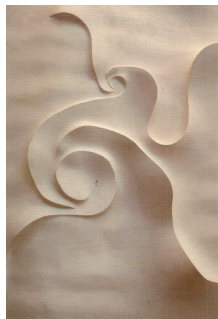

We welcome participants who are trained as psychotherapists and/or Jungian psychoanalysts and have worked in clinical practice for at least two to three years since graduation. We welcome also those therapists and analysts who have begun to supervise and would like to learn more.

This is the first event of what we hope will become regular courses on the theme of supervision.

Generally

Psychotherapy supervision can be conducted both within private and public work settings and also as part of training within a collaborative learning community.

Supervision within a work setting will support the practice of psychotherapy within a range of settings where psychotherapy is the method of treatment. In addition to supervision of work in a private practice, the course will also support work in the field of social welfare (both social support and advisory treatment), in the treatment of abuse, within pastoral activity, in crisis and trauma cases, e.g. when working with refugees etc.

The aim of this kind of supervision can be formulated as first and foremost to facilitate for the psychotherapist/supervisee, ethical, creative and effective work with their clients. The aim of supervision too is to help prevent any deterioration of practice if the therapist is overworking, ill or becoming estranged from his/her own public or private work setting.

Within training, supervision, can be seen from a different angle. This kind of supervision is more about giving help to a less experienced practitioner. It is more about reaching a deeper understanding and experience of the work at hand and helping supervisees in training to develop their confidence and consciousness about all aspects of the supervisory process, including the application of theory, parallel process and the role of the supervisor's personality.

The supervisor has a professional responsibility to ensure that his/her supervisees are developing well, especially if they are in training. The supervision process can make intense demands on the supervisor, especially when having to evaluate candidates, and on occasion, convey to supervisees that their work is not of a good enough standard. With more intensive psychotherapy, the supervisor needs to be able to help supervisees recognize when their clients are regressing, need additional support than the therapy can provide, and when supervising candidates within their own institutes, attend carefully to professional boundaries.

Target Group for the Supervision Course:

We are pleased to invite:

Qualified Jungian psychoanalysts from the Scandinavian and Baltic region but also from other parts of the world.

Qualified experienced psychotherapists/ psychoanalysts working in private practice, in the public sector and/or in other work settings.

We welcome applicants who are already supervising as well as those who are thinking about becoming supervisors and are keen to learn about the theory and practice of supervision.
